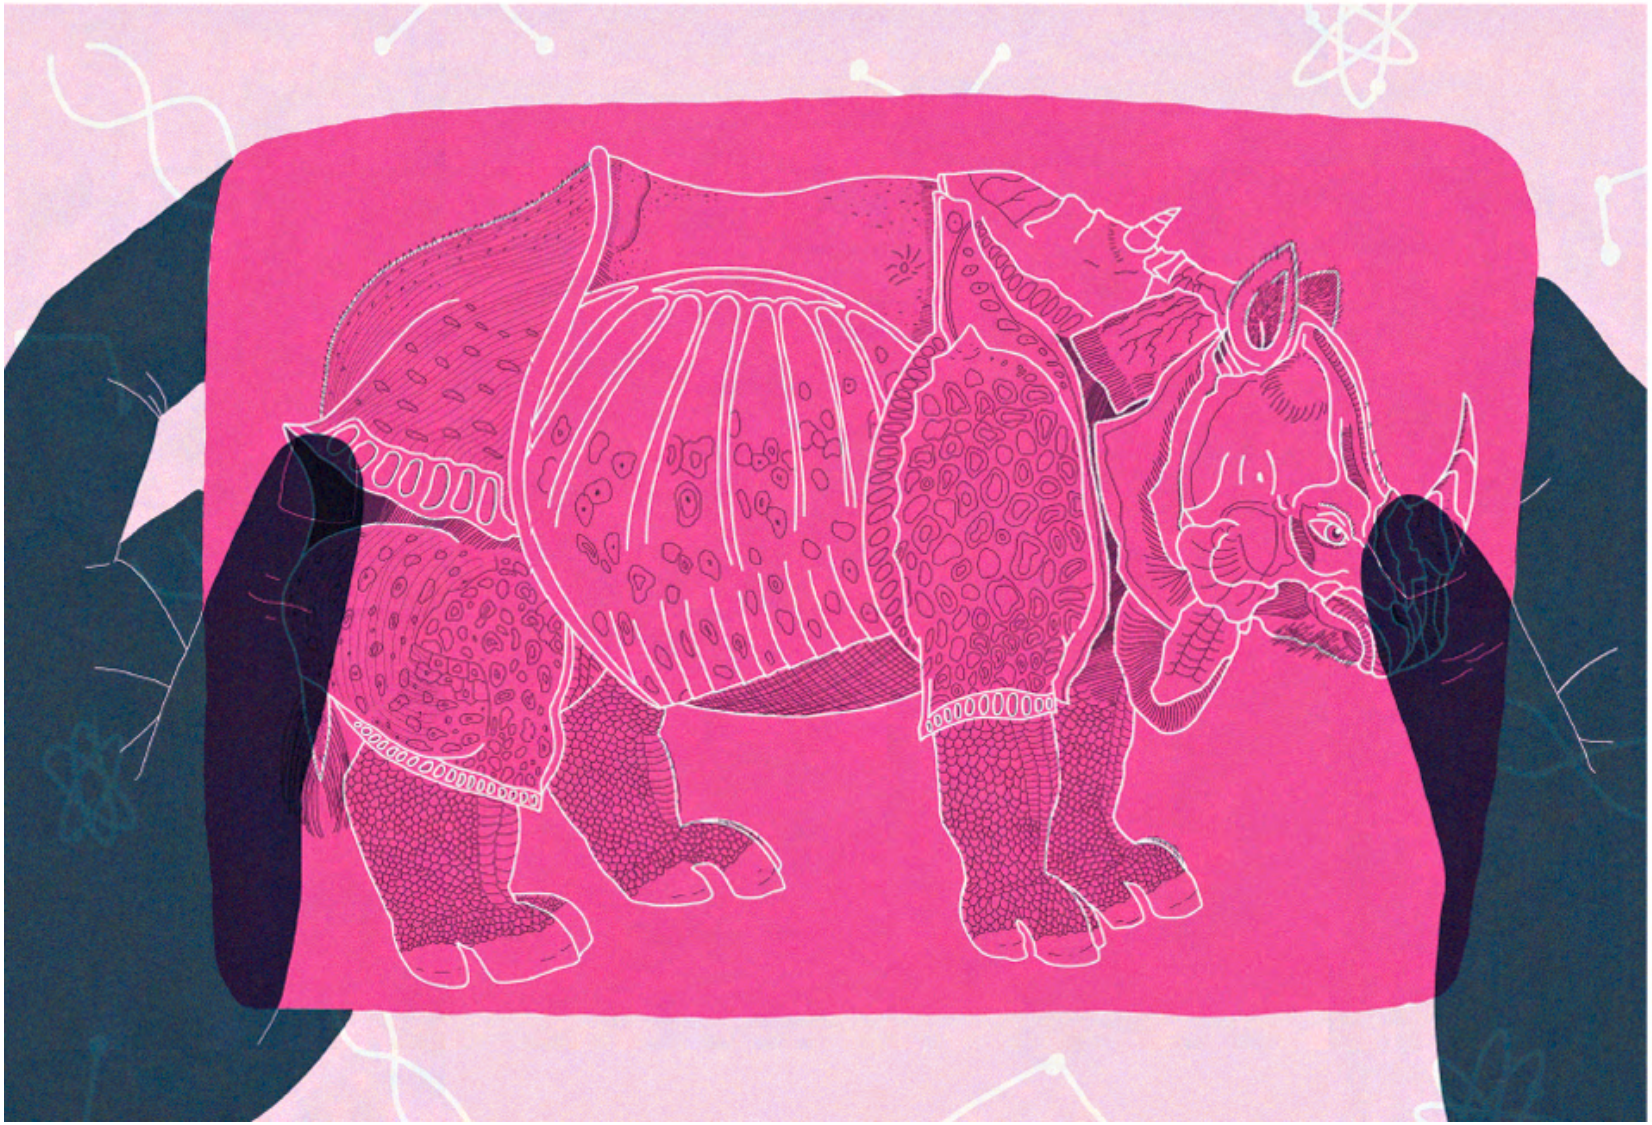
The Rennaissance, Enlightment & Industrial Production

After the development of the Gutenberg printing press, information and knowledge became more accessible as well as the documentation of ideologies and beliefs. Albrecht Durer's 'Rhinoceros' is a drawing, based on the description of an Indian Rhinoceros, that was then mass-produced and sold for cheap to allow the print to reach a wider audience. This reinforced the imagery of a rhinoceros with armour-like skin and was referenced in art and textbooks years later. During the Renaissance period, perspective emerged from the interest in science and art, which allowed painters to gain a higher sense of realism. 'Arnolfini Portrait' by Jan Van Eyck is a famous wedding painting that has been analysed by many. David Hockney theorised that the use of a convex mirror projected the scene onto a flat surface which allowed Van Eyck to achieve accuracy; "if the convex side was silvered and employed as a mirror, it is likely that the concave side could as well have been used to project the image." (Dotson, 2020)

The Enlightenment era was a movement that questioned authority, freedom and faith. As scientific academies largely dominated this time period, the development of scientific journals allowed information to be passed onto the public. Encyclopédie, published in 1777, consisted of mathematicians and scientists knowledge questioned ideologies that went against the church. More people became interested in philosophy and so the establishment of coffee houses allowed discussions by scholars as it was cheap for customers to purchase a coffee and listen to numerous scientific subjects.



But it was Dürer's woodcut which won out. Within a short space of time, it had eclipsed both Penni's doodle and Burgkmair's more accurate version – and would go on to shape how people viewed rhinoceroses for almost 300 years. Indeed, so total was its dominance that it was still the most recognisable picture of a pachyderm until well into the 20th century. (Lee, 2020)

Illustration Lecture Program

Illustrations in response to the lectures and questions about art history and how that has influenced us in present day.
